リサーチ目的

This research is to study Chinese social movement for urban preservation. The development of Civil society, including NPC/NGO and other social sections is not only in China, but also universal in East Asia. I seek to study Chinese case in this background of Asian Context. I will prove my hypothesis through my study of the activists, journalists, and other actors in the urban preservation issue.

研究課題

The topic is to research the citizen's participation in the social movement for urban preservation. It will answer this question: Why Chinese citizen participation can succeed in changing the models of urban governance. In detail, I will explain the question through four factors of citizen participation: It's origins, its mobilization, its communication, and its outcome.

The study will research further about Chinese politics through the participation issue. We may understand the "raison d'être" of contemporary Chinese politics, and evaluate how it works.

成果

The investigation in China from Feb. 20 to Mar. 11, has achieved much fruit. The investigation primarily is conducted by interview and fieldwork in traditional communities. I visited Beijing, Nanjing, and Shanghai, and succeeded in meeting several important figures in Urban Conservation Issue.

(1) I interviewed several famous expert and Senior official of Chinese government. For example, Xie Changang, who is the former Director of National Administration of Culture Heritage, introduced his experience in joining in the conservation efforts, and especially told me how he tried to lobby Chinese leadership take this issue into account.

(2) I visited several Non-government or grassroots activists, including Hua Xinmin and Zeng Yizhi. The two ladies are the most famous activists in urban preservation. They introduced the process that how the activists united to persuade local government to respect urban heritage.

(3) I also met some volunteers of China Memory, the biggest NGO nationwide on urban heritage issue.

In general, this investigation fulfilled my plan to interview the key actors of the social movement of urban preservation.
